

HW 15-4 Soln)

The solitary proton doesn't spontaneously decay because there are no particles like itself that have less mass (remember, less mass is more stable). In the nucleus, though, one presumes that there is some additional energy available from the other nucleons that would provide the energy difference between the proton state and the neutron state.